Habitat for Humanity and Art Project

West Coast Faux House to benefit Habitat for Humanity

Join art, charity, and TLC's most popular TV show. A home currently being filmed for Flip That House lost direction when the main character suddenly died.

The widow, author Jeanette Fisher, gained fresh inspiration from a project near Washington DC headed by philanthopist Adrienne van Dooren. Over 100 artists collaborated, using their talents to raise funds for Habitat for Humanity for hurricane victims in New Orleans. They have raised over half of their goal to build a new home. And, the hardcover book hasn't even come out, yet! Limited edition preview book:

The House That Faux Built showcases the art completed for the project. A similar book will promote the art and sponsors on the West Coast Faux House.

Dear Friend,

When my husband died in the middle of this flip, our world turned upside down. We depended on Brian for more than finishing this house. He took care of us. He bought all the groceries and cooked breakfast, lunch, and dinner. He kept the cars full of gas. He made sure the pool chemicals were right. Brian fixed things like Koi pond filters and antique custom cars. He was helping our youngest son rebuild a 1970 Nova.

Adrienne van Dooren gave us hope like the rainbow I captured the day before we met.

The picture was taken from our home's deck. The right end points to the house we're working on for this project.

As the author of many real estate books, I don't know why it never occurred to me to write a book about our Flip That House project! Adrienne has encouraged me to write a book like hers. And, she's helping me find the artists to create a West Coast Faux House to benefit Habitat for Humanity.

What's amazing about this flip, we already had filmed a day at Habitat for Humanity's store in Corona before Adrienne suggested I do the project.

Joy to you,

Jeanette Fisher

P. S. We have many different benefits for our artists and sponsors.
